Information security leaders are increasingly under pressure to do more with less. Full-time resources, dedicated to information security, are needed in order to establish and run an effective program; however, in many cases, these individuals can be hard to fund and even more difficult to find. To meet the pace of business, many organizations are embracing staffing models that enable program execution and resource flexibility. By leveraging partners that can provide information security resources quickly and economically, they can secure the organization's critical business assets, while also minimizing fixed costs and overhead.
